Models of networks are now used to describe a wide range of complex systems. We outline how and why a simultaneous study of multiple metrics which quantify a network's structure is beneficial. We demonstrate how such an approach can shed new insight in analyzing and modeling social, engineered and biological systems.