FIGURE 3  The home of Marcos Diraz, El Mozote's wealthiest inhabitant, was destroyed in the massacre. This photograph was taken in late 1992, prior to reoccupation of the house by a surviving sister. Cerro Chinga can be seen in the background.
The memorial at El Mozote. The inscription reads:

“They did not die, they are with us, with you,
and with all humanity.”
United States Ambassador Deane Hinton with Domingo Monterroza in March 1983.
El Mozote in January 1982, about a month after the massacre.
Rufina Amaya in January 1982, about a month after the massacre.
Santiago, director of Radio Venceremos, broadcast news of the coming military operation throughout the zone.
"Late on the afternoon of the third day, as they stroked the tiny brushes to draw away bits of reddish dust, darkened forms began to emerge from the earth. Soon they knew that they had begun to find, in the ruined sacristy of the church of Santa Catalina de El Mozo, the skulls of those who had once worshipped there."